Committing to memory the demonstration of another is acknowledged to be of little benefit to the pupil. Development of the reasoning powers comes only from their judicious exercise; and this is possible only in small degree from merely yielding assent to the logic of another. In an experience of twenty years the author has found that fully three fourths of his pupils can demonstrate unaided, or at most with a suggestion or two, the majority of the theorems, the demonstrations of which are given in most text-books for the pupil to read and memorize. Consequently he has endeavored to be consistent, and offer aid in the way of suggestions only where the pupil needs it. In most text-books the proof of the following easy theorem is given for the pupil to memorize; viz.: If two parallel lines are cut by a third straight line the exterior interior angles are equal. On the very same page are given others, far more difficult, for the pupil to prove unaided. The same condition of things is found on many subsequent pages. The author's experience has been that nine tenths of his pupils demonstrate the above theorem correctly unaided, and that the other tenth need only a single suggestion. The same is true of a large number of the theorems and construction problems usually given in full. In this revised edition, the arrangement of the sequence of theorems has been radically changed in many places, noticeably in placing the subject...
