Not illustrated. 1812 Excerpt: .amused in the very best manner, and at all times, if it be possible; but it is no amusement where the desire exceeds the enjoyment, where possession leads to disappointment and chagrin, or when the temper of an infant is hurt by the very means you employ to give him pleasure. The rule in this case is simple, and nothing but extravagance of affection and misguided partiality could make you mistake it. In all cases, whether children are fretful or pleased, the wisest method is to leave them very much to themselves, to discover those things which. will best amuse them. I never saw any fastidiousness respecting the object of pursuit, nor fretfulness occasioned by the enjoyment, when they were thus left. It is the wisdom and experience of the parents, directing their infant minds, and wishing to increase their happiness, that renders them miserable. Adopt...
